Die Cutting Errors Make for Novel Varieties by Bill Groom

Die cutting errors made by engravers have created many an interesting variety for collectors of coins and tokens, alike. Given the more exacting standards of mints, the most glaring errors have tended to be the products of private die sinkers or engravers who produced merchant tokens; particularly so, back in the 1800's. While many die cutting errors were minor, still others stood out .... if one was good at spelling. Can you spot the spelling errors on the following, mid-nineteenth century merchant tokens:

Fox's Casino was located at 620 "Chestnut" St. during the Civil War. The 1863 Military "Necessity" token features crossed cannons on the obverse. Civil War tokens were necessary for trade, and cannons were necessary for warfare. Buffum's Mineral Water was produced in "Pittsburgh" during the war. The Van Cott token predates the war and is actually the size of a large cent. Van Cott was a retail jeweler in "Racine" not Racim, Wisconsin. Last but not least, it's very difficult to imagine that a die cutter could mistakenly misspell the word "S-P-O-T!" For obvious reasons, this humorous variety is a longtime favorite among collectors of Civil War tokens. Imagine, the horror ... getting shot in your SPOOT !!

Back in the mid 1800's, these tokens were readily used in daily commerce as a cent's worth of copper. In today's collector market, they are worth two or three thousand times their original value. Then too, we can prize them even more for the history of bygone days that they convey.
